CREDENTIALING BEST PRACTICES

Conduct Your Research

It's essential that you know what you're getting into before starting the process. Every insurance company has different processes with unique difficulty. But, once you make a list and determine the ones you want to be credentialed with, you'll know what to expect.

Submit A Participation Request

This step allows you access to the health plan while processing your application. Once you join the insurance company's network, the health plan verifies it through several databases with the help of Primary Source Verification (PSV) and your application is submitted for approval.

Prepare Yourself

An effective way to be prepared is having your National Provider Identifier (NPI) readily available in the state you intend to practice. Additionally, you should have completed your CAQH before starting the process of credentialing. Once your resume is approved, you must do your re-attestation whenever you're required to.

Follow Up

Insurance companies often unintentionally lose applications once they aren't reviewed till the end. To avoid this, you should follow up on your application with all the insurance companies every time these applications are sent. If you do this every two weeks, you should get a seamless credentialing process.

Be Willing To Commit

If you think that credentialing will be done in a matter of days, the experience may be frustrating. Instead, commit a reasonable time to each insurance company you want to be credentialed with because filling and submitting the application, attaching required documents, and following up takes time.

Outsource Credentialing

For healthcare providers, outsourcing can be a practical alternative to doing it on their own. It saves you the stress and alleviate frustrations involved in the application. Moreover, the service of a reputable organization such as Practolytics assures a high success rate.
